Thus it is that old citizens of Charleston, S. C., remember, that while it was considered important to live in the country during the summer, the common observation of the people originated the custom of riding into town, not in the cool of the evening or of the morning, but in the middle of the day. They did not understand the philosophy; but they observed the fact that those who came to the city at mid-day remained well, while those who did so early or late suffered

Sixteen of a ship's crew, touching at one of the West India islands, slept on shore several nights, and thirteen of them died of yellow fever in a few days, while of two bundred and eighty, who were freely ashore during the day, not a single case of illness occurred. The marshes above night are attacked with mortal fevers. This does at first sight, seem to indicate that night air is unwholsome, at least in the locality of virulent malaries, but there is no direct proof that the air about suurise or sunset is not that which is productive of the mischief.

For the sake of eliciting the observations of intelligent men, we present our theory on this subject.

A person might cross these marshes with impunity, who would set out on his journey an hour or two after sundown, and finish it an hour or two before sun-rise, especially if he began that journey on a bearty meal, because in this way he would be traveling in the cool of the night, which coolness keeps the malaris so near the surface of the earth as to prevent its being breathed to a hartful

But it it is deadly to sleep out of doors all night in a malarial locality, would it be necessarily fatal to sleep in a house in such a locality? It would not.
